Research and framing

The core tension is not only price. It is uncertainty. People are asked to hand over personal information before they can compare the total cost, understand the care model, or decide whether a longer plan fits them.

Format note: access to the Patient-Facing-Flows Figma file was requested on September 17, 2026 and was still pending at submission, so the flow and landing page are delivered as this interactive page plus PDF and PNG exports of every screen. The frames will be ported into the Figma style guide as soon as access is granted.

Research confidence: this is an assumption-led design based on a heuristic review of the live flow up to the account gate, Zealthy's public weight-loss landing page, the exercise brief, and the Zealthy One Pager (company context only). Screens behind the gate are inferred from comparable telehealth flows and are labelled as such. No patient interviews or usability tests were conducted, so the persona below is a proto-persona, not a claimed research finding.

Observed friction

Urgency arrives before value

A limited-time discount appears immediately after one goal question. It can feel transactional before trust, clinical fit, and program value are established.

Observed friction

Pricing hides behind an account wall

The live journey asks for Apple, Google, or email account creation before a user can reach payment and compare the complete offer.

Prompt gap

Longer terms add mental math

Quarterly and six-month plans introduce larger totals. Without monthly equivalents and savings context, comparison gets harder at the moment of commitment.

Design opportunity

Progressive disclosure

Explain the care model first, ask only questions that improve relevance, then introduce plans before requesting an account.

Design opportunity

One comparison language

Show term, total due, effective monthly price, renewal cadence, and savings in the same order on every plan card.

Design opportunity

Keep financing honest

Offer pay-over-time as an optional checkout path without inventing approval, APR, or installment claims before eligibility is known.

1

Goals

A multi-select question asks what the person hopes to accomplish.

2

Limited-time offer

When observed on September 16, 2026, the experience promoted $96 off the first month beside a sale end date. The exercise pricing implies an $86 first-month discount, $135 to $49.

3

Account gate

Apple, Google, or email signup is required before pricing and payment are reached.

4

Behind the gate INFERRED

Eligibility and intake questions, then a single monthly plan at checkout. Longer terms have no comparison surface today.

02

The person behind the funnel

A useful starting point is a cautious comparator: someone motivated enough to click an ad, but still evaluating clinical credibility, cost, and how much commitment is realistic.

Proto-persona

The cautious comparator

Goal-oriented, price-aware, and wary of hidden fees. They want clinical support but may not yet know which treatment is appropriate.

“Show me what I get, what I pay today, and what happens next. Then I can decide.”

Trust before commitment

Clear clinical process, provider-review timing, and eligibility language before any medication expectations.

Cost without decoding

Total due, renewal timing, effective monthly cost, and exact savings should scan in seconds.

A commitment that fits

Monthly flexibility, quarterly balance, or six-month value, without implying the longest term is right for everyone.

A human path forward

Ongoing support from a care team needs to feel concrete, not buried as fine print.

1

Earn the next step

Each screen answers a question before asking for more information.

2

Compare like with like

Use consistent price anatomy across every plan.

3

Recommend, do not pressure

A recommendation explains why and remains easy to change.

4

Separate care from hype

Use clinical eligibility language and avoid medication promises.

03

Redesigned onboarding

The proposed flow keeps the early goal question, confirms state and BMI eligibility before anyone invests time, adds one preference question to support a transparent recommendation, moves plan comparison before account creation, and keeps the selected plan visible through account setup and payment.

Step 1 of 7

What would you like help with?

Choose any that matter to you. Your answers help us shape the next steps.

☒ Lose weight	☐ Explore GLP-1 options
☐ Build lasting habits	☐ Feel more active

A few basics, so we only show care you can get

Providers are licensed by state, and weight care eligibility depends on BMI. Checking this now means nobody compares prices for care they cannot receive.

State Select your state	Date of birth MM / DD / YYYY
Height 5 ft 6 in	Weight 200 lb

✓ Providers are available in your state, and your BMI of about 32 is within the range a provider can evaluate for weight care. Final eligibility is confirmed by a licensed provider after intake.

Screen 3 of 7

A few health questions

These help your provider rule out treatments that are not safe for you. Choose any that apply.

☐ Pregnant, breastfeeding, or planning pregnancy

☐ Type 1 diabetes

☐ History of pancreatitis

☐ Personal or family history of medullary thyroid cancer or MEN2

☐ History of an eating disorder

☒ None of these

The full medical history is collected in intake after a plan is chosen. These questions only keep plans from being shown to someone who cannot safely be treated.

Screen 4 of 7

What matters most right now?

Pick one. It decides which plan we recommend next, and you can still choose any plan.

☐ Lower upfront cost

☐ Flexibility month to month

☐ Lower average monthly cost

☒ More time to build habits

Choose your membership

All plans include online intake, licensed provider review, and ongoing support from your care team.

Recommended: 3 months, because you chose “More time to build habits”. You can pick any plan.

12 months	$1,534	$1,396	$1,198

Savings compare each prepaid term with the $135 standard monthly rate. The $49 first-month offer applies to the monthly plan only, so monthly is the cheapest way to try Zealthy for up to 3 months ($319 versus $349); over 6 or 12 months the prepaid plans cost less ($698 or $599 versus $724 at 6 months). *Illustrative pay-in-4 split; eligibility, terms, and APR are shown by Affirm at checkout. Medication cost is not part of the exercise pricing and must be confirmed before production.

Questions people ask before they start

Do I qualify?

Eligibility depends on your state, age, BMI, and health history. You see the basics before any plan is shown, and a licensed provider makes the final decision after your intake.

What is the $49?

Your first month on the monthly plan is $49, then it renews at $135 per month. The 3-month and 6-month plans are billed once per term at $349 and $599.

What happens after I choose a plan? —

You create an account, complete a short online intake, and a licensed provider reviews it. If treatment is clinically appropriate, your care plan follows, with ongoing support from your care team.

Can I cancel? —

Yes. Monthly memberships renew each month, and 3- and 6-month memberships renew at the end of the term. Cancel anytime before your renewal date from account settings.

What if a provider decides treatment is not right for me? —

Provider review happens before any treatment starts. If care is not appropriate, you are told why and refunded in full.

Is medication included in the price? —

Membership pricing covers your clinical care, provider review, and care team support. If medication is prescribed, its cost is shown before you pay, never after.

Ready when you are.

Prescription products require an online consultation with a licensed healthcare provider, who determines whether a prescription is appropriate. Individual results vary. Availability varies by state.

Privacy · Terms · Telehealth consent

Savings compare prepaid terms with the $135 recurring monthly rate. Treatment is subject to provider review. The $49 first-month offer applies to the monthly plan only, so monthly is the cheapest first term ($319 versus $349 over 3 months) while the prepaid plans cost less over 6 or 12 months. *Illustrative pay-in-4 split; eligibility, terms, and APR are shown by Affirm at checkout. Medication pricing, refund and cancellation terms, the patient count, and care-team inclusions require confirmation with clinical, legal, and marketing teams before this page is published.

Why the flow is structured this way

The design treats trust and comprehension as conversion inputs. It gives each page one job, while keeping price language and the selected plan consistent from ad click to review.

Move pricing before account creation

Reason: people can evaluate the offer before giving personal information.

Risk to test: fewer early account captures may reduce retargeting volume.

Confirm eligibility before showing plans	Reason: state licensing and BMI decide whether care is available at all, so asking first avoids selling a plan that provider review will reverse.	Risk to test: personal questions this early may lower continuation, so the copy has to explain why each one is asked.
Say “Recommended for you” and show why	Reason: the recommendation follows the one priority the person picked and names it, so it reads as help rather than a universal “best value” claim.	Risk to test: recommendation language may still anchor selection; compare against no label.
Quote savings against the $135 standard rate, not the $49 offer	Reason: the $49 first month makes monthly cheaper than the 3-month plan for a new member’s first term ($319 versus $349) and narrows the 6-month saving to $125, so every savings figure names the rate it compares against.	Risk to test: price-aware users will do the promo math; options are a first-term credit on prepaid plans or recommending 6 months by default.
Keep total and monthly equivalent together	Reason: supports comparison while preserving the real amount due.	Risk to test: some users may mistake the equivalent for an installment.
Add Affirm as an optional path	Reason: addresses heavier upfront pricing for longer plans.	Risk to test: eligibility, APR, and approval language must come from the provider.
Capture auto-renewal consent at checkout	Reason: the renewal price and cadence sit next to the total with an explicit checkbox, which is what negative-option and state auto-renewal rules expect.	Risk to test: extra checkout friction; measure completion against a disclosure-only version.

Show product facts as placeholders

Reason: intake length, provider turnaround, coaching inclusions, and the patient count come from public materials, not from the product team, so they are marked for verification rather than asserted.

Production need: replace each with Zealthy’s verified figure before publication.

State medication-price uncertainty

Reason: the exercise provides membership prices but does not define whether medication is included.

Production need: confirm inclusions, renewals, cancellation, refund, and financing terms.

06

Measure and roll out

Three plan lengths change cash flow, refund exposure, and retention, not only conversion. The rollout has to prove the pricing-first flow earns more paying members without creating a refund or support problem later.

Primary metric

Net revenue per landing visitor

Measured at 90 days, after refunds. A lower conversion rate with a richer plan mix can still win, so revenue per visitor decides. Secondary: paid conversion from landing to first payment, plan mix with a target of 35% or more choosing 3- or 6-month terms, first-payment order value, and Affirm take rate on prepaid plans.

Guardrails

Any breach pauses rollout

Paid conversion down more than 10% relative to the current flow, 14-day refund rate up more than 2 points, chargebacks above 0.5%, a rising share of payments reversed because a provider declined treatment, or more billing and cancellation support contacts per 100 orders.

Experiments

Three tests, in order

1. Pricing-first flow against the current account-first flow, split evenly on paid social and search traffic, for two weeks or 1,000 first payments per arm. 2. The “Recommended for you” label against no label. 3. Affirm hints on 3- and 6-month plans only against every plan. The winner ships to everyone behind a flag that can be reverted in minutes.

Open questions

Decisions needed before launch

Whether medication cost sits inside membership pricing, the refund rule when a provider declines treatment, whether the $49 first month applies only to monthly, today’s median tenure on monthly, Affirm merchant terms, and which states are covered on day one.

What the three terms do for the business

1

Cash up front

2

Fewer churn moments

A 6-month prepay collects $599 on day one against $49 on monthly, so paid acquisition cost is recovered at checkout instead of over months.

Monthly carries five renewal decisions and five card-decline risks in the first six months; a 6-month plan carries none. A monthly member who leaves after four payments is worth $454, a 6-month member $599.

3

Refund exposure

Prepay creates a refund liability: $599 times the ineligible-after-payment rate times the prepaid share, plus mid-term cancellations. Revenue is recognised monthly, so finance carries deferred revenue.

4

The intro offer sets the mix

The $49 first month makes monthly the cheapest first term, so the mix skews monthly unless prepaid plans earn their price with continuity and a recommendation the person can see the reason for.

07

How I would walk you through it

The story moves from the business problem to the person experiencing it, then into the design, the numbers behind the pricing, and the decisions that still need validation.

01 Frame the challenge

Introduce the three-term pricing brief and the tension between affordability, commitment, and trust.

02 Show the observed journey

Walk through goals, the early discount, and the account wall. Separate observation from assumption.

03 Introduce the proto-persona

Explain the cautious comparator and the four needs shaping the solution.

04 Demo the redesigned flow

Move from goals, eligibility, and safety questions to priorities, compare all plans, create the account, then show continuity at payment.

05 Walk the landing page

Connect ad intent to clinical trust, program value, and transparent pricing.

06 Close with validation

Name the open content questions, test plan, success measures, and next iteration.

The one-sentence story

This redesign shifts Zealthy's signup from urgency-first to confidence-first, while making three commitment levels easy to compare and easy to carry through checkout.

1. Show what is known.
2. Label what is assumed.
3. Explain each design choice.
4. End with what should be tested.
